Chapter 1 by Dave W.

Toast. I love toast. It's not the best food, but it's not trying to be the best food. It's low-expectation food. I put two slices of bread in the toaster, they come out toasted, and I put them on a paper towel that fits the two slices exactly. Then I can put something on it. There's so much that you can cover toast with.

Another exciting feature of toast is its ability to expand beyond being just 'hot bread'. There are a variety of toppings you can put on for starters, but there's also a variety of other things it can be used for: Paninis, Soups, Garlic bread, the list goes on and on. I make toast all the time.

Like right now, I'm standing over this toaster, making toast, watching these little coils on the inside turn orange (they turn orange so fast), and wanting to die.

I watch the toast pop up, jumping a little at the sound the springs make: releasing all their tension. I think I burned the toast a little, but I can only see the top. I grab a paper towel, throw the two pieces of toast on top, and after failing to find a clean knife decide to butter them with the edge of a spoon. I think spoons might actually be better for spreading butter, the serrated edge on a knife usually scrapes off a bunch of crumbs that I have in indiscriminate piles around my living room and kitchen. haha I did not mean a butter knife, I am not the type of person who owns butter knives. I imagine butter knives would be the best, but the more I think about it the more they just seem like overpriced spoons.
